Abstract. Phragmites australis (Cav.) Trin. ex Steud. is a dominant species in coastal wetlands of the United States. Phragmites is a highly invasive species that has been spreading rapidly in the United States and is a major threat to coastal wetlands. The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of herbicide application on Phragmites growth and biomass. The study was conducted in a coastal wetland in the United States. The study area was divided into two treatment groups: a control group and a herbicide treatment group. The herbicide treatment group was treated with a herbicide called glyphosate. The control group was not treated with herbicide. The study was conducted over a period of 12 months. The results of the study showed that the herbicide treatment group had significantly lower growth and biomass than the control group. The herbicide treatment group also had significantly lower seed production than the control group. The results of the study suggest that herbicide application can be an effective method for controlling Phragmites growth and biomass.

These data demonstrate that the use of the in vitro model system for the study of the effects of chemical agents on the development of the human embryo is a valuable tool for the assessment of the potential developmental toxicity of chemical agents.
